CANROBERT'S ROMANCE.

Marshal Canrobert inhabits a small hotel in the Rue de Marignan. Like most French soldiers, he is careless of luxury, and buries himself but little about the fine arts. The first thing that strikes one on entering is a little perambulator hidden away under the staircase; the walls are covered with the most modest engravings, water-color sketches and photographs, which do not speak well of the marshal's goûts in les beaux arts.

And now I would say a few words of Madame la Marechale. At the close of the Crimean campaign, one evening, at a reception held at the Ministers des Finances, as Marshal Canrobert entered the saloon, a young lady, whose remarkable beauty was not a little enhanced by her simple dress of plain white tulle, came with shy boldness up to the hero and said:

"Monsieur le Marechal will do with me as he did with the Russians, and make me dance?"

"You forget, mademoiselle, that there is an armistice now?"

"And a free pardon and amnesty for my boldness, I hope?"

Without replying, the marshal offered the young lady his arm, and bringing her up to a young officer who happened to be standing near, said:

"Tenez, monsieur! Dance this quadrille with mademoiselle, and bear in mind that to-night a Marshal of France envies a sub-lieutenant."

Before many years had passed the young and beautiful Miss Flora Macdonald who had aspired to dance with the coadjutor of Marshal Pelissier, had become Madame Marechale Canrobert.

After having waited a few minutes in the salon above mentioned, a servant announces that M. le Marechal is ready to receive you, and, mounting to the second floor, you are ushered into the presence of the old warrior in his den; a simple room, without any ornament, but littered with books bearing on military matters, maps, etc., etc. Marshal Canrobert is about seventy, and of medium height. His gray hair is very curly, and the ensemble of his face is most agreeable, the forehead being being high and intellectual, and the glance from his eyes kind but keen, brilliant and penetrating. His carriage is stern and resolute, but the back is a little bowed, and the head inclined to one side when the marshal speaks. The tone of his voice is splendid; it rings, and the slight southern accent lends an irresistible charm to the frank, soldierly words of greeting with which you are made welcome.—Whitehall Review.

"HONEST TOM."

"Talk about your clever campaign dodges," said Judge Diffenderfer, as the crowd filed out from the latest political cat fight at Pratt's Hall the other night—"why, these fellows don't know the first rudiments of catching on with the people."

"Don't, eh?" growled Dr. Botts, who was up for School Director, and who had just been called a reprobate and corruptionist by four different speakers.

"No, sir," emphatically reiterated the Judge. "They don't even understand human nature—these fellows don't. All they think of resolutions and beer. Now, there's Tom Gidley, of Kentucky. He understood a thing or two, Tom did."

"Knew it all, I s'pose?" snapped the doctor.

"Well, I'll just give you one instance," continued Diffenderfer. "Tom was running for State treasurer 'bout four years ago. He was nominated by a split from the regulars, and, as usual with independent tickets, he hadn't one chance in a thousand of being elected. Now, what do you think Tom did?"

"Sold out, I s'pose?" said the other old crony.

"Not much, he didn't! Tom just bought a whole grass of umbrellas."

"And gave 'em to the voters?"

"No, sir; far from it. He just went 'round and returned 'em to people—pretended he'd borrowed 'em the last rain before. Grasp the idea, don't you?"

"No, I'm blamed if I do."

"Way, it's plain enough. You see, he was up for Treasurer, and it impressed people with an idea that he was the most honest man in the State. The idea of a man's actually returning an umbrella was something stupendous. He was elected by ten thousand majority, and though he's got richer than a pork-pie in office, they call him 'Honest Tom Gidley' to this day."—San Francisco Post.

THE FRENCH WRESTLERS AT THE FAIR.

The owner of the booth, or circus, has usually two or three professional wrestlers, a heavy, medium, and light weight. As soon as lifting weights, throwing weights, balancing weights, and other such like performances are got through, the wrestlers stand forth and challenge each individual in the crowd to an encounter with whichever of their number he shall himself choose. There is usually some one among the audience bold or foolish enough to try his skill, for which daring feat he usually gets a rough mauling and a heavy fall on the sawdust thrown down in the middle of the ring.

But on this occasion it seemed the very height of folly for a lad of some 19 years to accept the challenge, as his appearance was slight and his form wholly devoid of muscular development. That, however, was his affair, not ours. Reeling behind a little knot of his companions, he stripped himself completely naked, and remained so, with the exception of a pair of bathing drawers throughout the encounter.

When he appeared on the sawdust he looked like a lath. Never had we seen a form so utterly devoid of those bunches, or protuberances, on any legs or chest which are usually held to indicate strength. His color was that of a Red Indian, his appearance that of a lad of seventeen. His professional opponent, on the contrary, was a very mass of muscles, which hung about him like knots, reminding one of the cartoons of Raphael or the paintings of Rubens.

To it they went with a will, at first warily stretching out hands to lay hold of hands then striking arms or feeling for a grip at the waist. Presently the professional had his man round the body, and lifted him about like a straw, but somehow he could never throw him fairly down. The youth's feet seemed to feel the ground even when dangling in the air; he turned himself about like a snake, he fell on hands or feet, or laid himself on the ground flat upon his stomach, while the athlete danced round him, pulling, tugging, twisting in vain—for to gain the battle it is necessary to make both the shoulder blades of the fallen touch the ground.

For a good quarter of an hour the youngster battled like a bull with his head down, slipped out of the most deadly grips, and sometimes threw his adversary with great violence, yet without making his shoulders touch the earth. The professional got wary; he was evidently a little afraid, yet never doubted the final issue of the fray. At last they joined and wrestled furiously, struggled, fell—the youth under the giant; one more turn and it would be all over with the poor boy, when suddenly he caught the athlete round the neck, squeezed, as in a vice, his jugular, lifted him clean up into the air, planted him as flat as a pancake upon his broad back, and rose the victor of as fine a struggle as ever mortal eyes beheld. We pitied the poor professional, for he looked very downcast; but the amateur we admired so much that we offered him money, which he refused, showing that he belonged to the better class, and was no confederate.—The Argosy.

JESTING IN THE PRESENCE OF DEATH.

The two lines:

"A thoughtless jester even in his death,
Uttering his jibes beyond his latest breath."

were literally fulfilled the other day. An Irishman, who exercised the profession of "Ethiopian serenader," was being attended in his last moments by his priest. He seems to have been a very good sort of fellow, and was paying due attention to his spiritual adviser when suddenly a change came over his face. "I say, old boy," he exclaimed, mechanically assuming his stage voice, "I must just ask you this one question—"What's the difference between—" "My good man, your're dying," interposed the priest; "never mind that now." "Can't help that," rejoined the other; "it's such a capital riddle and just out. What's the difference—" And with that he dropped his head, and without another word to give a clue to what the enigma was that exercised an influence so so strong in death, went to find the answer to the great enigma of the universe.—Notes and Queries.

A word, a look, which at one time makes no impression, at another time wounds the heart, and like a shaft flying with the wind, pierces deep, which, with its own natural force, would scarce have reached the object aimed.

Every one must see daily instances of people who complain from a mere habit of complaining.
